

Kate's Daybook

A daybook may appear to be a singularly unexciting source of information. In most cases that would probably be a logical assumption; however if you are interested in local history, a daybook does provide information as to who associated with whom. Since this daybook was from Washington D.C., and kept by a woman's whose father was an ambassador, it adds understanding to who was whom in the social as well as political capital.

Katharine (Kate) Batcheller maintained a daybook recording the Washington Social season of 1891-92. What she left behind was a who's who of the politically and socially connected in the nation's capital. In this one source we find the; daughter of the President (who served as first lady during Mrs. Harrison's "confinement", wives of senators, supreme court justices and foreign officials.

The impact and importance of this daybook to Kate is readily acknowledged by the gold inscription on the inside lining of the book. It reads Tiffany & Co. Union Square.

Throughout this document, "Catharine" is used to refer to Mrs. Batcheller and "Kate" refers to Katherine the daughter.

The Batcheller's political history

In March of 1889 Republican President Harrison replaced Democratic President Cleveland. With a Republican in the White House all political appointments were replaced. George Batcheller, a lifelong Republican, wanted the position of either Ambassador to Turkey or Egypt. Batcheller's education and experience, especially his ten years on the international court in Alexandria, Egypt qualified him for either post. For reasons that are not clear, Harrison had different ideas for where Batcheller could best serve the administration, appointing him to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury, William Windom, was ill, so Batcheller was unofficially the Acting Secretary.

Assistant Secretary of the Treasury was not a position that Batcheller wanted, nor one that he enjoyed. His tenure in the position was at time when there were two ongoing political disputes effecting the treasury department. The first was protective tariffs – industry endorsed them; bankers, speculators and farmers despised them. The second issue was whether to continue backing our paper currency using the gold standard or to adopt the more speculative silver standard.

It was well recognized that Catharine and Kate Batcheller provided one of the few bright social settings in Washington during the Presidency of Harrison. In the society column of The New York Times January 28th 1890 Kate Batcheller's reception received two paragraphs including the following: "The young hostess, from her long sojourn abroad, is a great favorite with the diplomatic corps, whom seem by general consent to have selected the plan of making the longest and most informal calls at this agreeable house, so full of pretty things gathered in many lands." The 1889-90 Washington "season" ended with a reception at the home of Senator Leland Stanford (founder of Stanford University). All three members of the Batcheller family attended Stanford's party. This was at the same time as Stanford's sister-in-law was living at the Annandale Mansion in Saratoga. Three of her daughters also had homes in Saratoga.

Without air-conditioning, everyone, who could afford to, fled Washington D.C. each summer. The Batchellers spent the summer of 1890 in Europe. Upon his return to Washington in September, Batcheller recognized that he had had enough at the Treasury. Unofficial sources said he was offered either Ambassador to Portugal or Japan. It was the choice of two evils.

Relations between the United States and Japan were strained. Portugal was hardly the most glamorous appointment. Batcheller accepted Lisbon. He and his family left Washington in late November 1890. The family's arrival in Portugal was delayed because of an accident involving Kate. While getting off the train in Paris, Kate fell and broke her arm. The break was bad enough that she was not considered healthy enough to continue on for several days.

The Batchellers' home had been a social center. When they left the nation's capital for Europe it may not have created a social vacuum but it was, at the very least, a social cavity.

In May of 1891 Catharine and Kate went to visit the Queen at the Royal Palace in Lisbon. On their way home the axle on the carriage broke. Kate sustained minor injuries. Catharine's injuries were so serious she was classified as in critical condition. For Catharine, the Lisbon social scene was over.

Late in the summer of 1891, Catharine was well enough for the Batchellers to return to the United States. The last week in August they were in Saratoga. The Mansion had been rented for the season so they stayed at the United States Hotel. While Kate was considered to have fully recovered from her train accident in Paris and the carriage accident, Catharine was weak and could still not use her left arm.

In September of 1891, the Batchellers leased a house on Dupont Circle in Washington. It had been decided that the Batcheller women were going to stay in Washington and George would return alone to Lisbon.

With the Batcheller women back in the city, Washington added a jewel to its social crown. There was a serious caveat. Although the Batcheller women announced that they would receive callers on Saturday afternoons, Catharine was not well enough to return the calls. Kate would have to represent the family. Kate's daybook, for that social season, tells the story of who was in Washington, when one could visit and how often they should be visited.

Kate was 23 at the time she maintained this daybook. This was her mother's and her second prolonged stay in the city. There was still a Republican President. In effect Kate was near the peak of her social presence.

On February 12th, 1892, as the social season was coming to an end, Catharine and Kate Batcheller gave a breakfast for fifty of their associates in Washington D.C. Although Catharine had received callers all season, this was the first social event that she hosted. The newspapers reported that Mrs. Batcheller was finally fully recovered from her accident in Lisbon and would continue to give breakfasts to catch up on her social obligations.

Some suggestions on reviewing a Daybook:

The book was written in the order people came to visit or that the Batchellers went to visit. That tells the reader that the first people listed are those who for "political" or "social" reasons needed/wanted/enjoyed the Batchellers.

The number of calls made by an individual is always significant. The more often one "called" the closer she was to the hostess or at least wanted to be.

Kate was either even or behind on the number of visits; there was not a single case listed, including the Executive Mansion, in which Kate visited more than she was visited.

We will never know why some return calls were not made. In the case of people listed as having rooms in a hotel, it might have been that they were just visiting the city and time would not permit a return call. In the case of people listed near the end it could have been that the season ended before a return visit could be made. There is also the very real possibility that Kate deemed the person unworthy of a return call.

One woman arrived with a man of a different last name. This was often the practice of an engaged couple where the woman was making introductions.

There are times when more than one woman's name appears on a line – that was because the women arrived as a group.

Transcribing the book

The book is transcribed as closely to as it was written as possible.

The first section is the sequential list of who called on Kate and her mother. The second section is a day by day of the week providing Kate a list of when she could call on the person. The third section is an alphabetical list of women who had visited the Batcheller women but whose names were not listed by date for returning a call – read into the omission what you will.

The last section (8 pages) contains the names of the visitors listed alphabetically. It also includes those from the Albany daybook (names in red and blue). These pages were not in Kate's diary but were done so that readers could check to see if a specific person "called". On this list is often the position held by the woman's husband. These pages will hopefully be updated at a later date with even more positions listed.
